

When he assumed the job of Mayor, White Sulphur Springs, the city was still in shambles after the horrific flood of 2016, with missing streets, piles of sticks where homes used to be and long-time residents holed up in temporary housing. Thanks to the energetic efforts of Bruce and many others, today White Sulphur Springs, a city of 2,200 residents, bears little resemblance to the devastated war zone it looked like nine short years ago. New shops, restaurants and a one-of-a-kind boutique hotel have opened, and a new barrel factory is turning out products, Hope Village is housing residents displaced by the flood, the city park has been rebuilt and now, a multimillion-dollar family activity center is being built.

Bruce is passionate about this opportunity to bring the Family

Activity Center to White Sulphur Springs and to make our community be at the forefront of healthy communities in WV.
